

Since I've been making these posts about my experience at Moody Bible Institute, I've been getting some reactions from former classmates there. Some of these are in a public forum I'm on. Others have been private communications. A few of these have been kind and heartening. Others ... not.

Among the latter, some have told me that they pity me because of where I will end up on the day of judgment. Others have suggested that I changed my theological beliefs because that would help me become famous. Some have expressed both sadness and outrage that I have "led so many people astray."

So, dealing with these kinds of comments one-by-one, in one post at a time. First, the day of judgment. Well, none of us knows what will happen on the day of judgment, but I think I'm glad none of my classmates has been appointed to be the judge! That hasn't stopped them from judging in the present, of course, and one would think they would be a bit wary of that, given what Jesus says about such things (Judge not lest you be judged).

My view, of course, is that there is not going to be a judgment day, any more than there is going to be a second coming and a rapture and a future millennial kingdom. But if there is a God and there is a judgment, I really don't think that it's going to involve a Final Exam on theology, with those who get a failing grade being cast into the eternal lake of fire.

Moreover, if there is a God, he....
